They Just Don't Make Good Music Anymore!

How to find new artists to love, and get excited about your music collection again.

Join Meredith Colby, author of Money Notes: How to Sing High, Loud, Healthy, and Forever in a fun, interesting, and funny look at how and why we get attached to the music we love.

When you hear unfamiliar music in public or social situations, you have to wonder: how can people listen to this stuff? Music used to be so much better than it is now! But still, you probably feel a little bored with listening to the same music you've been singing along with since your high school and college days. What's a person to do?

Most people believe that their love of music is an emotional decision over which they have not control. You either like something or you don't, right? But the truth is that music, like any art form, can be disassembled into its component parts; each of those parts holding a kind of power that a listener is attracted to or repelled by.

In this 45 minute presentation, you'll learn:

- How and when you're listening to music makes all the difference!

- Your understanding of the history of music types affects how you hear them.
- How your physiology can influence your taste in music.
- Why music used to be more important to you, and how to reignite the flame.

Finding your musical “hot buttons”, along with being a confident visitor to YouTube, are key to discovering artists you never knew you loved. Join Meredith for the hour that will leave you with an appetite for something new, and the recipe for enjoying it.

An engaging speaker and an expert in her field, Meredith leaves her audiences both informed and empowered.

“My wife suggested this and we went together. I admit I wasn’t enthusiastic, but I’m really glad I went. It was an excellent presentation that we really enjoyed”.
